Notes

¹ Each of the two famous painters is referred here to by his respective place of birth: Li Cheng 李成 (919–967) was born in Yingqiu 營邱 (Shandong Province), while Guo Xi 郭熙 (1001–1090) came from Heyang 河陽 (Henan Province). Though separated as artists by roughly a century, the two are considered co-founders of a Northern Song style of landscape painting that favored evocative wintry scenes and stark atmospheric vistas—rendered largely, if not entirely, in ink—and often featured stands of ancient cypress and pine, or groves of gnarled leafless trees with clusters of claw-like twigs. Contrary to the assertion of Luo Zhenyu, while the current work generally conforms to these and other early conventions of depicting landscape, trees, and animals, it is actually a much later, deliberately archaistic, iteration of the Li Cheng-Guo Xi idiom, rather than an inspiration for it, and belongs art-historically to the wider fourteenth-century revival and reinterpretation of Northern Song styles. For a genuine Northern Song landscape painting traditionally attributed to Guo Xi, see F1916.538 elsewhere on this website.

As with other known depictions of sheep in the Yuan dynasty, this painting may indirectly allude to the captivity of the loyal Han dynasty general Su Wu 蘇武 (139–after 60 B.C.E.) and the hardship of his consequent duties as a shephard in the hinterlands of Central Asia. For details, see F1931.4 (Sheep and Goat), located elsewhere on this website.
